Weekly Vikings Roundup By Jack & Duane Kolsrud

This roller coaster of a Vikings' season finally came to an end today as the team faced off against the lowly Chicago Bears. With both teams already eliminated from the playoffs, today's game was more about records, contract incentives, and draft position, than it was about the 60-year-old rivalry between the two teams.

First Half

The first half for the Vikings was by far their worst half of football all season. The Vikings' defense was unable to force the Bears to punt at any point as the Bears' offense crossed into Vikings' territory on every one of their drives. Nonetheless, thanks to a couple of DJ Wonnum sacks, the Vikings' defense was able to hold the Bears to only two field goals. However, per usual, the Vikings' defense struggled in the final 2:00 of the half, giving up a late touchdown to extend the Bears' lead to 14-0. For the 2021 season, the Vikings have given up a total 128 points in the final 2:00 of either half, an NFL record.

The offense did absolutely nothing for most of the half as Kirk Cousins faced endless pressure from a Bears defensive line missing two of its starters: Khalil Mack and Akiem Hicks. It was only until their final drive of the half that the Vikings' offense came alive. Cousins was able to complete a 25-yard pass to Justin Jefferson, and a 40-yard pass to Ihmir Smith-Marsette on back-to-back plays, which gave the Vikings the ball on the Bears 11-yard line with 0:13 remaining. However, the chance for the Vikings to get a much-needed touchdown was quickly negated by a holding call on Oli Udoh. The Vikings would settle for a field goal and send the team into halftime down 14-3.

Second Half

The second half was a lot more exciting to watch for Vikings fans. Kirk Cousins, in what may be his last game as the Vikings' quarterback, completed three touchdown passes to three different wide receivers: a 44-yarder to Ihmir Smith-Marsette, a 45-yarder to Justin Jefferson, and a 21-yarder to KJ Osborn.

The Viking's defense also showed up big in the second half, intercepting Bears' quarterback Andy Dalton twice and even getting the Bears to finally punt. Patrick Peterson finally got his first interception as a Minnesota Viking and even put an exclamation point on it by returning it for a touchdown. After being down 14-3 at halftime, the Vikings suddenly saw themselves with a 31-17 lead with 4:54 remaining in the game.

The final minutes of the game for Vikings fans at US Bank Stadium was spent yelling at the team to get Justin Jefferson the ball one more time. Jefferson came into today's game needing 123 receiving yards to break Randy Moss' franchise record of 1,632 receiving yards in a season. Sadly, Jefferson was unable to break the record as he fell just 17 yards short, finishing the season at 1,616 receiving yards. It is important to note that Jefferson now is the only wide receiver in NFL history to have eclipsed 3,000 total receiving yards through his first two seasons.

Final Score: Vikings 31 – Bears 17. Vikings finish the season 8-9.

Final Thoughts

Rumors around the NFL indicate that Mike Zimmer will likely not be the Vikings' head coach next year. If these rumors turn out to be true, the Vikings will be starting fresh with a new head coach for the first time in nearly eight years. Although Zimmer never led the Vikings to a Super Bowl, Zimmer's success during his tenure as the Vikings' head coach cannot be understated. When he became the Vikings' head coach in 2014, the team had the lowestranked defense in the NFL. That quickly changed under Zimmer and by 2017, the Vikings became the best defense in the NFL. However, lately, the defense has struggled, and it is probably time for the Vikings to find a new head coach. Furthermore, this may be the last game for several Vikings players as well. Anthony Barr, Danielle Hunter, Kirk Cousins, and Patrick Peterson all have contracts that will give the Vikings organization tough decisions on what to do with them.

Post traumatic radio syndrome

Ask any old disc jockey if they ever have the "dead air dream" and they'll all tell you they do. Or used to. In those frenetic studios, especially if you were doing mornings, you were ripping the AP news wire, prerecording programs, and answering the phone (because for the first couple of hours, you were the only one in the building) while trying to keep records cued up and sounding chipper. It was weird. For years, the first words I spoke each day were into a microphone.

That's Life by Tony Bender

Invariably, with all the distractions, the record would begin to fade, and you'd scramble to the microphone while dropping the needle on the next 45. Sometimes, you were too late and even a second or two of radio silence was the greatest sin one could commit. And I was the king of dead air.

Thus, the dream.

You'd be sleeping and it would be too quiet, so you would instinctively jerk awake. I used to have them all the time, even years after I quit the business. Posttraumatic radio syndrome. I haven't had one for a long time, but that's what startled me into consciousness in the wee hours this morning. And I haven't been in radio for 31 years. It's kinda Pavlovian.

Snowy days were the worst because the phone rang incessantly. Every hopeful kid in the region would call: "Is there school today?" One after the other after the other after the other... You'd want to scream, "Listen to the radio!" My buddy Bob Booker once recorded three minutes of the calls and played them back to illustrate the stupidity of the KQDJ listening audience. Radio has a way of making you crazy, and when he quit, I got his old job.

I did terrible things, for instance, during a swap and shop segment, I fielded a call from a sweet old lady with a thick German accent announcing her "crotch sale." Oh, I asked, was it a big crotch? And did she have a lot of stuff in her crotch? So we spent about five minutes discussing her crotch much to the horror of the weasel salesman who sold sponsorships on the program. In my defense, the woman was quite proud of her crotch. She insisted there were no mice in there.

We churned through four general managers in my three years in Jamestown, ND, and each time, Tim Ost, my roommate and program director, and I would hold up new management for a raise. This blackmail went on until they hit the bottom of the barrel and made The Weasel the new GM. He said no to the raise. Putz.

To make matters worse, he devised a holiday promotion that was the dumbest thing ever. We were supposed to call people indiscriminately out of the phone book and if they answered, "Merry Christmas!" they'd win—get this—a two-liter bottle of Coke. Of course, this would be hugely embarrassing because no one's gonna do that, I argued vociferously, but the greasy comb-over genius insisted. Embarrassingly, we did a big advertising build up. God, it was lame.

As the morning man, I was to launch the contest at about 7:15 and get egg on my face. As the time approached, I watched through the windows of the studios as the whole staff scrambled to their desks to listen to see what I'd do. I made a huge insincere deal about it, extolling the virtues of Coca-Cola and the greatness of any radio station that would give such a fine Christmas gift away. Ring. Ring. A meek, shaky, female voice answered. "Hello?"

JOHNSON AGENCY Real Estate & Insurance Jay Johnson, Broker www.johnsonagencygroton.com 102 N Main St. Groton, SD 57445 Office: 605/397-2424

"YOU LOSE!" I screamed into the microphone. When he fired me, The Weasel said, "Tony, we're going to have to let you go..."

"I suppose a raise is out of the question."

My favorite radio gig was in Juneau, Alaska, where management embraced my obnoxiousness because it was good for ratings. We also did a lot of community service which is how I got roped into doing a show with the Alaska Highway Patrol to illustrate the perils > of drinking and driving. I was supposed to steadily drink a bottle of Wild Turkey at the mall and they would test my reaction time every 20 minutes or so on a mock car set-up. The thing is, I kept getting faster. And faster. And faster, still. Because I'm a gamer. By the time the show was over, I'd set all kinds of records. Pretty good show, too.

South Dakota returns millions in unused housing assistance funds to federal government

By: Bart Pfankuch, SD Newswatch

South Dakota has sent millions of dollars of unused COVID-19 housing assistance funds allocated to help low-income renters — back to the federal government, mainly because not enough people applied for help.

SOUTH DAKOTA NEWS WATCH

As of early January 2022, the state had received about $271 million in federal funding to pay rent and utilities of low-income residents who fell behind during the pandemic. But so far, the state has distributed only about $24.9 million to needy residents, or about 9.2% of the total available funding.

In September, South Dakota and other states that did not spend the money fast enough were required to return some of the money to the federal Treasury. That month, South Dakota returned about $22 million in unused housing assistance funds to the federal government, which is reallocating the excess money to states that are using it faster.

Several other states, especially those in rural areas or with smaller populations, have had to return unused housing-assistance funds. Overall, the federal government said disbursing the money to low-income renters has gone more slowly than expected across the country. The program will continue to offer assistance at least until 2025.

Lorraine Polak, executive director of

ment Authority, which several reasons. One

was that Congress

sistance money to the state; another that less rental assistance was needed because South Dakota did not shut down its economy as some other states did early in the pandemic.

"South Dakota has been successful in getting ERA funding to the residents in need," Polak wrote to News Watch in an email, referring to the federal Emergency Rental Assistance program. "Because our state didn't shut down or require businesses to close, we had fewer requests for assistance than other states that took away people's ability to provide for themselves. In addition, many of our residents are homeowners, and this program only applies to renters." Polak pointed out that with a population of under 1 million, and the assistance program limited to renters who qualify as low-income, there was no way the state could spend all $271 million from the program, part of which extends into 2025. "We had more funds than necessary to meet the needs in our state," Polak wrote. "It was best to return those taxpayer dollars to the Treasury." To help implement the program in a fast and functional way, the housing authority enlisted local agencies across the state to aid in the application process and allocation of funds that were ultimately paid directly to landlords and owners of rental properties. Officials with two of those agencies said that while the program could have been run better, and likely could have helped more people, they said Polak did a good job managing the program and that the state continues to help

"The state and all

residents throughout

"There's a lot of stuff going on here that is beautiful, things that you don't see."

Smith said his team has sometimes driven long distances to hand-deliver assistance checks to landlords so renters could avoid eviction. He said the partnerships among local aid agencies and with the state housing authority have been strengthened as a result of the collaborative effort to run the housing program.

While those involved in administering the program see room for improvement — mostly by encouraging more people to apply and potentially expanding it to homeowners · IIIdI Iy state housing officials view the program as largely successful in helping people maintain housing. Polak said the state program has provided aid to about 4,000 households statewide, and Smith said his agency has aided about 1,350 families in 22 South Dakota counties.

authority assistance applications have been filed, mostly in rural or reservation counties. The most populous counties, Minnehaha and Pennington, led the way in overall applications filed.

"At the end of the day, hopefully everyone that needs assistance is able to get that, and I think $25 million is a lot of money," Polak said in an interview with News Watch. "It has been quite a process, but it's been a great opportunity to provide the assistance to households that need it, and it's been a great opportunity with our partner agencies to work on this with each other in a statewide effort."

Federal funds form basis of programs

South Dakota has used three separate federal funding programs to assist with housing costs for low-income residents during the pandemic. Legislators in 2020 used a special session to approve using $10 million in federal Cares Act funds to provide money for rent, mortgage payments and utility bills to renters and homeowners affected by the coronavirus pandemic.

Congress then approved two rounds of funding in 2020 and 2021 through the Emergency Rental Assistance program that set aside almost $47 billion to aid renters in states, large cities, U.S. territories and on reservations. Homeowners were not included in the ERA program and tribes were excluded from the second round of ERA funding.

The money was given to states to distribute to landlords and owners of rental properties to support low-income residents with rent and utility payments. The goal was to help renters stay housed and assist landlords who operated under a federal eviction moratorium from September 2020 to August 2021.

In January 2021, the federal government estimated that U.S. renters overall were in arrears by at least $20 billion and as much as $57 billion, potentially putting millions of American renters—particularly in minority communities-at risk of eviction. The eviction moratorium and economic slowdown during the pandemic caused many landlords and building owners to suffer significant financial losses as renters struggled.

South Dakota received $200 million in ERA-1 funds and $61 million in ERA-2 funding. When added to the $10 million appropriated by the Legislature in 2020, the state has received a total of $271 million in Cares Act funding in housing assistance, the large bulk targeted at renters. Six months into the ERA-1 program, the U.S. Treasury reported that only $1.5 billion of the $25 billion allocated, or about 5.8%, had been provided as rental and utility assistance across the country. Two months later, the amount had jumped to $7.5 billion, or 30% of the total, still far below what Congress had intended. In a report in May 2021, the Treasury noted that "while some state and local programs are increasingly reaching households in need, others lag far behind." In an October 2021 report, the Congressional Research Service noted that the low rate of expenditure of ERA-1 funds "has caused some to raise concerns about the effectiveness of the program in preventing evictions as eviction moratoriums end, and in addressing the backlog of rent and utility debt."

"I would say the efficacy of the program has been excellent," Smith said.

Some housing advocates and members of Congress have expressed concerns that some renters in the U.S. who need help due to the pandemic are not getting it, and that states need to do more to allocate the aid where needed.

The program's challenges underscore the difficulty that federal, state and local governments have faced in distributing pandemicassistance funds to those who need help in a timely, well-managed way that limits fraud and abuse.

State data show that in 21 of the 66 counMembers of Congress have watched the program progress and some have expressed concern that the assistance is not being distributed in a timely fashion.

"There's no question that the funds aren't reaching landlords and renters quickly enough," U.S. Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., said during a House committee meeting on the ERA program in September 2021.

Some states were slow to implement systems to distribute the assistance, and some renters complained the paperwork requirements were too extensive or required computers and online proficiency. The Treasury reduced some paperwork requirements in ERA-2 compared with the first round of funding. ERA-1 assistance will end in 2022 but ERA-2 funds can be allocated through 2025.

However, as some states continued to lag in allocating assistance money, the Treasury in September 2021 enacted a "recapture and reallocation" process that required states that were not providing assistance fast enough to return money to the federal government, which likely will go to states with greater need or more efficient delivery systems.

For South Dakota, that resulted in the return of $22 million in housing assistance funds in September 2021, and more could be returned this spring, Polak said.

North Dakota, where about $15 million in assistance has been provided so far, officials have said the state expects to return $149 million of the $200 million it received in ERA-1 funding.

According to a South Dakota Housing Authority report in January 2022, about 3,800 households statewide had received some federal housing assistance, while about 1,850 applications were abandoned after being started.

Polak said it is impossible to identify why some people dropped out of the application process, as applicants perhaps returned to work, moved out of state or found the process too burdensome.

South Dakota housing officials twice asked the federal government for flexibility to spend unused rental assistance funds on programs such as those to build new affordable housing, but were rejected both times, Polak said.

U.S. Rep. Dusty Johnson, R-S.D., said in an email to News Watch that he supports letting states use ERA funding in other areas if they aren't able to spend it all on rental assistance.

"The Biden Administration flooded states with cash and they can't spend this money fast enough," Johnson wrote. "I'd like flexibility for states to spend unused dollars on things like roads and bridges before [C]ongress considers even more inflationary deficit spending."

Improvements suggested as program goes on

Some states hired private contractors to administer the program, but South Dakota handled allocation of funds through the South Dakota Housing Development Authority, an arm of state government. The authority, which typically works with developers and other established housing partners, was immediately tasked with developing a complex new system to provide direct financial assistance to landlords, Polak said. The housing authority enlisted the help of several local aid agencies across the state to let low-income residents know about the program and to administer the first steps in applying. Local agencies also played a key role in getting approved funding directly to landlords. The housing authority was aggressive in trying to get the word out about the availability of assistance, Polak said, posting information on the agency website, working with local aid agencies to inform their clients of the opportunity for help, and providing notification through utility companies, daycare providers and churches.

Renters and landlords facing financial challenges can still get federal funding to help them. Photo: News Watch file

The authority and its local partners also spend significant time with applicants, assigning case workers to aid each renter and conducting extensive follow-up through the application and aid allocation processes, Polak said.

"In essence, we're talking with every applicant; some of them have my direct number," she said.

Mike Walker, executive director of NeighborWorks Dakota Home Resources, said his agency participated in the first round of housing-assistance funding but declined to partner with the state in the second and third rounds. His agency, based in Deadwood, serves people western South Dakota.

Walker said the initial housing-assistance program allowed agencies to provide aid to households in both low-income and mediumincome categories and to those who owned their homes. In the first round of funding, homeowners and renters who earned up to 115% of the median area income could qualify for help, whereas the second two rounds of federal funding were restricted to renters who make up to 80% of the median area income, Walker said.

"When they [the federal government] did that, that they eliminated over half their customers," Walker said. "By limiting that and giving a lot larger dollar amount, they overallocated."

For instance, Walker said many working families in western South Dakota make enough to gualify for help at the 115% median income level, which is about $86,700 a year for a family of four in Lawrence County. But those families, many who lost work hours and faced financial hardships during the pandemic, did not qualify for help at the 80% median income threshold, which is about $60,300 a year in Lawrence County. "When they put those limits on there, they eliminated some of the people who really needed the help," Walker said. "That's the main reason the money didn't go out." The different rules came about because the first round of funding was approved by the state Legislature, and the two subsequent rounds are subject to rules set by the U.S. Treasury. Smith said he would like to see the assistance program help more homeowners with back mortgage payments; those residents qualified only for the initial $10 million funding effort authorized by the state Legislature in 2020.

opportunities to use funding to help even more people are not available right now.

"On the ERA program, our caseworkers are doing a bang-up job. Has it been helpful, have we seen the impact on people's lives? Yes, we have," Smith said. "Have we seen people go forward with their lives, and getting their jobs and lives going forward? Yes, we have."

Polak said the rental and utility assistance programs are ongoing, and she urged any tenants or landlords who are struggling to visit the housing authority website or their local aid agency to learn how to apply for funding. She also noted that other programs coming soon to South

Dakota will be aimed at providing help to homeowners as well as renters.

Dear EarthTalk: Is the recent lifting of quota restrictions on wolf hunting in Montana north of Yellowstone National Park a threat to the reintroduced wolf population there?

—J. W., Bend, OR

When the last gray wolf in Yellowstone National Park was gunned down in 1926, park managers and ranchers on neighboring lands alike rejoiced together that the dark predator of the range would no longer torment them. Wolves were blamed for poaching livestock as well as wreaking havoc on populations of traditional "game" animals like elk and deer. But a funny thing happened once the wolves were gone. Elk numbers started to skyrocket. In essence, without the wolf around to keep its population numbers in check, the elk were eating everything in sight, including the new young shoots of willow, aspen and other trees key to keeping Yellowstone's ecosystems in balance.

By the 1990s biologists managed to convince the federal government that these predators are essential to the health of the ecosystem, and grav wolves were famously reintroduced back into Yellowstone. The results have been nothing short of amazing with regard to ecosystem recovery and the return of various species of wildlife that used to be common there a century ago.

But ranchers on the periphery of the park (Wyoming, Idaho and Montana all border Yellowstone) have maintained their antipathy toward wolves given the primal canids' predilection for killing domesticated cows outside of the park for a quick and easy meal. Such situations are rare given that there is plenty of wild game for the wolves to hunt within their home base inside of Yellowstone's borders. Nevertheless, anti-environmentalists and otherwise conservative pundits have joined forces with ranchers to politicize the wolf reintroduction issue. No doubt, there is a lot of political pressure from those who make their living outside of the national park to lift all hunting restrictions on wolves that stray onto state lands. So, it comes as no surprise that Montana would lift quotas limiting hunters and trappers to just two gray wolf kills each in regions bordering Yellowstone. A similar move in Idaho months earlier means Yellowstone's wolves are now getting it from all angles. And, indeed, with more than 15 wolf kills in the Montana borderlands alone so far this winter, it remains to be seen whether or not the easing of the state's wolf hunting restrictions is such a good idea after all. Back in 1995-1997, 42 gray wolves were relocated from Western Canada and northwestern Montana to Yellowstone; today 123 gray wolves spread themselves across nine different packs free-roaming within the national park. While the population has grown nicely and remained stable for the last decade or so, increased hunting could send these packs into dangerous territory when it comes to their ability to reproduce themselves.

Sadly, for the wolves (and for us), a false dichotomy persists that we can't have successful livestock agriculture and preserve the ecological integrity of the world's first national park at the same time. But the fact remains that we can, especially with programs to reimburse ranchers for their rarely occurring losses to wolf predation. In the meantime, the states are likely to make it easier and easier to shoot or trap wolves that unwittingly cross over into state lands, and politics will continue to be behind it all.

definitively confirm the diagnosis. Imagine that the symptoms can flare up and then mysteriously disappear, including fatigue, low grade fevers, joint pain, and mouth sores. All these symptoms overlap with multiple other conditions further complicating a diagnosis. Imagine that the best available method for diagnosing this ailment is a manual checklist of eleven criteria and if the patient suffers from at least four, they receive a diagnosis on a scale of definite, probable, or possible.

What if I told you this condition is caused by an attack on the body by its own immune system and the main way to treat this is by suppressing the immune system we each depend upon to help protect our bodies from infection. The course of this illness can range from mild to rapidly progressing to organ failure and death. This condition is real and has a most appropriate name which means "the wolf" in Latin. The condition is systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE), a condition which evades diagnosis and is difficult to treat.

Lupus mainly affects women between the ages of 15 and 40, particularly women of color. For many busy young women with lupus, symptoms are often brushed off by family, friends, and unfortunately sometimes by health care providers who may view the patient as being "tired" or "over worked." Routine wellness lab tests, which serve as an alert system for other illnesses, provide no indication of lupus. Patients who persist and find someone to further investigate their symptoms may be misdiagnosed with a myriad of other conditions sometimes resulting in unnecessary medications, treatments, and further suffering. Work is underway to better understand lupus. The trigger that causes the immune system to start attacking itself is not known, but scientists suspect it involves a combination of genetic and environmental factors. Research and awareness are making a difference. In the 1950s, the 5-year and 10-year survival of SLE patients was less than 50 percent. Since then, that number has improved to over 90 percent. This increase in survival rate stems from improvements in our ability to diagnosis lupus earlier and to provide better treatments once diagnosed. But we must do better. Early diagnosis of lupus requires patients and health care providers working together to persist in finding this "wolf in sheep's clothing." If you or a loved one has a concern about lupus or other autoimmune conditions, talk with your doctor and see if a consultation with a rheumatologist would be beneficial.
